CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE 18 OF THE CONVENTION

Initial reports of States parties

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

V.90-80201

In March 1988 the Federal Republic of Germany submitted its first Report on the Implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (U.N. Document CEDAW/C/5/Add. 59). This report will be reviewed in accordance with Article 17 of the Convention by the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) at its 9th session in February 1990. For this purpose the Report is updated and supplemented by this document.

In 1987 a comprehensive population census was carried out in the Federal Republic of Germany, the results of which were published in 1989 and have been considered in the following. In addition to that, new laws and measures which were important for women came into being and are to be incorporated in the Report.

Part I:

Living conditions of women in the Federal Republic of Germany

1. Population

In the Federal Republic of Germany including Berlin (West) about 61.1 million people, of whom approximately 4.5 million are foreigners, live in a territory of 249,000 km². According to 1987 figures, the 31.8 million women living in the Federal Republic of Germany make up the majority (52 %) of the population whereas the men number some 29.3 million or 48 %.

Every third inhabitant lives in one of the 64 cities (with more than 100,000 inhabitants). Twenty-five million people, that is 40 % of the total population, live in communities of less than 20,000 inhabitants, 3.8 million of these in villages (with under 2,000 inhabitants). The population density is high compared with other European States. Seen in relation to the area of the national territory, the Federal Republic of Germany has a population density of 246 inhabitants per km² (compared with 101 in France, 76 in Greece, 233 in Great Britain and Northern Ireland and 358 in the Netherlands). The distribution of the population is, however, very uneven. In some conurbations, as in the Ruhr area, the population density is 5,500 people per km² whereas other regions are relatively sparsely populated.

In recent years the age structure of the population has changed, the trend now being towards an increase in the percentage of elderly people. For many years the Federal Republic of Germany has had one of the lowest birth rates in the world: there were only 11.1 births per 1,000 inhabitants in 1988 (1987: 10.5). Women have a clearly higher life expectancy than men: 78.4 years for new-born girls, and 71.8 years for new-born boys. There are almost twice as many women as men in the over 65 age group (see Table 1.1).

Somewhat less than half of the female population (46.4 %) is married (see Table 1.2). On average, single women marry at the age of 25.2 years and single men at the age of 27.7. On the whole, the number of marriages dropped between 1950 and 1981 and has been increasing only slightly since then. In 1988, 397,738 couples were married and 128,729 were divorced.

In 1988, 6 million married couples and 952,000 single parents - 817,000 of them single mothers - had children of under 18 years. More than half of all families have only one child and families with three children and more are unusual (see Table 1.3).

2. Political system

The Federal Republic of Germany is a parliamentary democracy. The fundamentals of its system of government have been stipulated in its constitution, the Basic Law of 23 May 1949. The Federal Republic of Germany is a federal state, i.e. it consists of 11 Federal Laender and the Federal Government. The Federal Laender themselves are states with their own constitution, state authority and government organs. The Basic Law lays down the legislative and administrative competences of the Federal Government and the Laender. In the Constitution the communities are guaranteed the right to local self-government. Decisive importance within the political system of the Federal Republic of Germany is attributed to the political parties whose task, according to the Constitution, is to participate in the forming of the political will of the people. The political parties have a strong influence when it comes to selecting those who will be appointed to public offices and functions and as far as the determination of policy content is concerned. At present, five parties are represented at the German Bundestag, the parliament at federal level; these are the Social Democrats (SPD), the Christian Democratic Union (CDU), the Christian Social Union (CSU) in Bavaria, the Free Democratic Party (F.D.P.) and THE GREENS. 7.0 % of the men entitled to vote but only 1.8 % of the women entitled to vote are members of these five parties.

The social partners, in other words, the trade unions and the employers' associations, are also very important. They are guaranteed bargaining autonomy by the Constitution, that is, they are entitled to conclude collective labour agreements with each other, to agree on wages or salaries and to stipulate working conditions without interference from the government. Out of the approximately 27.4 million gainfully employed persons, 24.3 million are wage and salary earners (1988 micro-census). About 9.4 million gainfully employed persons are members of the big trade unions; of these approximately 2.3 million are women.

3. Economy

The economic structure of the Federal Republic of Germany is predominantly characterized by industry and trade. With regard to its overall economic performance, the Federal Republic of Germany ranks fourth in the world. The real value of its gross national product more than doubled between 1960 and 1986.

Since the end of the Second World War, agriculture has gone through profound changes: while in 1950, 20 % of the gainfully employed persons were still working in the agricultural sector, only 5 % do so today. During the same period, the number of farms with agriculturally productive land amounting to 1 hectare and more fell from 1.6 million to approximately 700,000. Nevertheless, today agriculture covers about 80 % of the domestic demand for food.

4. Women in public life

Women constitute the majority (more than 52 %) of the persons entitled to vote and yet they are not adequately represented in most spheres of public life. In parliaments, governments and administrations, in political parties, trade unions and the media as well as in other political and social decision-making bodies, they are clearly under-represented. One of the decisive reasons for this is the traditional role allocation, according to which women are given responsibility for the family, and men for the spheres of gainful employment and public life. In fact, this role allocation is still widespread in the Federal Republic of Germany and deeply engrained in many people although laws and regulations have long abandoned this practice and it is being questioned with growing frequency in the population. In addition to that, the traditional living and working conditions often prevent women from participating actively in public life.

Over the past few years, the percentage of women in the parliaments has increased. Since 1918 women have the right to vote and to stand for election, but it was not until the election for the Bundestag 1987 that they passed the 10 % mark and obtained 15.4 % of the mandates. At present the President of the German Bundestag is a woman. In the parliaments at Laender level, the percentage of women has clearly risen and ranges between 9.6 % and 29.1 % today (Table 2.1). In the elected representative bodies of the municipal and local authorities the proportion of women has also grown continuously during the last years. In communities with more than 20,000 inhabitants, such women represented 16.6 % on an average in 1988 (vs. 10.8 % in 1983) and in cities with more than 100,000 inhabitants the proportion was even approximately 19.1 %. Some cities (e.g. Munich, Freiburg, Göttingen) even registered proportions of more than 30 %.

The percentage of women in the Governments at Federal and Laender level is still very low, too, even if a positive trend unmistakably exists. Today 3 ministers within the Federal Government are women (of 19 ministers in total = 15.8 %) as are 2 of the parliamentary state secretaries (of 27 in total = 7.4 %). In the middle of 1989, the governments at Laender level included a total of 23 female ministers, 1 female parliamentary state secretary and 11 state secretaries. Since spring 1989 women have a clear majority in the Senate of Berlin (West), for the first time ever in German history, 8 of 13 Ministries are headed by women.

In the political parties the percentage of women increased steadily during the past few years. About one quarter of the members of the 5 parties represented at the German Bundestag are women (see Table 2.2). Yet, the proportion of women appointed to important functions in the political parties is generally smaller. In the 5 parties mentioned above a definitely positive development can be seen in the party executives at the federal level (see Table 2.3).

In the trade unions, nearly half of the members are men (48.4 %) whereas only about a quarter of them (24.8 %) are women (see Table 2.4).

Here, too, women are still under-represented in positions of authority and in management committees considering the size of their membership.

In the economy, women are hardly to be found in leading positions. In 1988 their percentage in first-level management was 5.9 %, in second-level management 7.8 % (1987: 6.1 %). In the same year, only 0.7 % of the corporate directors and only 0.3 % of the supervisory board members were women. In contrast to this, the number of self-employed women in charge of their own enterprise considerably increased, today every third business is started by a woman.

Science and the universities, too, are for the most part male-dominated. Although 40.2 % of the new students in 1987 were women, their percentage among the professors was only 5.1 % and a mere 15.6 % of the full-time teaching staff at the universities were women.

5. Women in gainful employment

Women play an increasingly important role in gainful employment in the Federal Republic of Germany. The developments and trends depicted in the Report (Nos. 9 - 34) are continuing.

There was an overall rise in employment which reached its highest level to date in August 1989 with 27.81 million gainfully employed persons. At the same time, the number of gainfully employed women increased and their proportion of the working population rose to 38.9 % (see Table 3.1). It was the women who profited in the main from the rise in employment which took place between 1983 and 1988 (69.6 %). Above all, there was a growing participation of women in the 20 to 50 age-group in gainful employment. A particularly striking increase was also observed in gainful employment among single mothers bringing up children 6 years old and younger (1982: 87,000, 1986: 120,000, increase: 37.9 %).

There was a slight shift in the distribution of women among the different professional branches: 77 % of all gainfully employed women are to be found in the service sector where they constitute more than half of the employees (51.9 %), and their proportion is still growing. Their presence in the agricultural professions, however, has dropped from 54.4 % to 43.3 % since 1973. Now as in the past, they represent a minority in the technological professions (12.0 %), but there has been a slight increase in recent years (see Table 3.2).

The number of female apprentices in occupations hitherto chosen predominantly by young men rose from 13,000 (2.5 %) to 62,000 (8.4 %) between 1977 and 1987.

Part-time work, most of which is done by women (92.6 %), has spread. In 1988, 30.1 % of the wage and salary-earning women were in part-time jobs. The unemployment figure considerably declined during the past two years: the average annual rate of unemployed persons in relation to the wage and salary earners was only 8.7 % in 1988. However, at 10.0 %, this rate is still higher among women than among men (see Table 3.5). When comparing the number of unemployed to all gainfully employed persons, (wage and salary-earners as well as the self-employed) as is usual worldwide, the figures are even lower. This method of calculation produced an unemployment rate of only 6.6 % on the whole in September 1989 (September 1988: 7.4 %), and of 8.3 % among women (September 1988: 9.1 %). On 1 July 1989 the Federal Government initiated a programme to combat long-term unemployment designed to be specifically of benefit to women.

After having interrupted their professional activities - in most cases because of childbirth and the bringing up of children - more and more women desire to return to their job. The Federal Government and the Laender recognized this as a central problem of women's policy and numerous programmes of action were set up to solve it. They will be described in greater detail in the following (see Article 11).

6. Institutions for the enforcement of equal rights for women

In the meantime, a dense network of institutions was established at all administrative levels in the Federal Republic of Germany. Their objective is to put equal rights for women into practice in everyday life. In addition to the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health, which can be seen as the equal-rights office of the Federal Government and which has already been described in the Report (Nos. 44, 45, 52), two Ministries for Women's Affairs have been established in the meantime at Laender level (Schleswig-Holstein in 1988, Berlin (West) in 1989). A rapid development, however, took place at community level. In 1982 the first community office for equal rights for women was set up in Cologne; in 1986 there were about 100 offices nation-wide; in autumn 1989 their number rose to almost 500. The large and medium-sized cities have an equal-rights office, and the small towns, communities and the districts are following suit. In June 1989 the Federal Government submitted a report on equal-rights offices at Federal, Laender and community level to the German Bundestag. The Report describes these institutions and their development, sets forth the difficulties they have to overcome and presents the progress already made. It comes to the conclusion that the equal-rights offices have already shown concrete achievements on all levels but that they need to be better equipped so that they can work efficiently towards achieving equal rights for women.

It is the task of these institutions to implement measures of the kind which is requested in the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women. Their everyday work directly serves the purpose of implementing the provisions of this Convention in the Federal Republic of Germany.

Part II:

The Provisions of the Convention and their implementation in the Federal Republic of Germany

Re Article 1: The term "discrimination"

The interpretation of the term "discrimination against women" has widened over the past few years; for example, in the meantime it is generally accepted hat there exists what is known as indirect discrimination. Decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Communities and the Federal Labour Court have clarified that in the field of labour law the prohibition concerning discrimination also encompasses indirect discrimination.

Re Articles 2 and 3: Legislative and other measures to eliminate discrimination against women and to ensure the full development of women

As a supplement to the Report (see Nos. 55 - 74) the principal measures taken and laws passed in favour of women in the Federal Republic of Germany since the principle of equal rights was enshrined in the Constitution in 1949 (Annex II, overviews 1 and 2) have been listed in Annex II. Moreover, the measures and the main points of emphasis of the work done by the equal-rights offices of the Laender have also been described (Overview 3). Finally, an overview of the publications of the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health outlining the results of research projects, investigations and pilot projects and furnishing information about measures and laws relevant to women, is to be found in Overview 4.

Re Article 4: Special measures to achieve de facto equality between women and men

It is in the area of the law that the greatest degree of equality between men and women has been realized in the Federal Republic of Germany. By contrast, in many other areas, many forms of de facto inequality and situations where women are at a disadvantage still persist. The most pressing aim of the present policy to achieve equality in the Federal Republic of Germany is therefore to achieve de facto equality of rights. Most of the measures listed in Annex II can be seen as special measures in the terms of Article 4 of the Convention.

In this supplement we intend to highlight only two areas in which special measures play a particularly important role:

- the advancement of women in professional life, and
- the advancement of women in politics.

1. Advancement in professional life

In addition to the "Guideline for the Professional Advancement of Women in the Federal Administration" (see Report No. 123), corresponding guidelines for the civil service are to be found in most of the Laender and in numerous municipalities. The objective of these guidelines is to improve women's chances of finding employment, being promoted and entrusted with high-ranking posts and offices, as well as receiving further training, part-time employment and resuming gainful employment. Apart from this, it is incumbent upon the Federal Government to fix quotas, among others reasons, because of provisions contained in the Basic Law (Art. 33, paragraph 2 of the Basic Law: "Every German shall be equally eligible for any public office according to his aptitude, qualifications and professional achievements").

By contrast, initiatives can be detected in some Federal Laender to replace existing guidelines by laws which would sanction giving preference to women over male candidates when they are equally qualified and in some cases also envisage quotas. In October 1989, North Rhine-Westphalia passed a Law on the Advancement of Women for the civil service envisaging quotas. According to this Law, women will be given preference in sectors where they are under-represented - provided they have the same qualifications as the male candidates - until such time as the proportion of women equals that of men.

In the private sector, an increasing number of firms are taking promotion measures tailored specifically for women, setting up promotion schemes for women and employing commissioners for women's affairs. The Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health has published a "Leitfaden zur Frauenförderung in Betrieben" (Guideline for the Promotion of Women in Companies) which furnishes practical tips with regard to measures for the advancement of women and has met with a positive reception in the firms. To a growing extent, measures for the advancement of women are also becoming part of industrial and collective wage agreements.

The many pilot programmes conducted by the Federal Government, the Laender and the municipalities can also be seen as special measures to achieve de facto equality in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention. They are intended to facilitate the access of women and girls to male-dominated professions - especially in the industrial and technical sectors. Similar efforts in this direction are also those measures which provide women with specialized further training in the field of new technologies and grant assistance in the founding of new firms by women. The special programme for the reinsertion of women into professional life which will be discussed at a later stage, also falls into this category.

2. Advancement in politics

As Part I has already indicated, women are under-represented in politics. The political parties have a key role to play in augmenting the participation of women in politics. The large parties have passed resolutions the aim of which is to ensure that women are given greater consideration when appointments are being made to party offices and functions, and in the distribution of mandates or places on the party list.

The GREENS (DIE GRÜNEN) and the SPD (Social Democratic Party of Germany) have introduced a system of quotas. In 1986, the GREENS incorporated a provision into their constitution according to which all bodies and organs of the federal association of the party must comprise at least 50 % women representatives. In 1988, the SPD changed its organizational statutes to the effect that at least 40 % of either sex must be represented in the offices and functions of the party. This regulation is to come into force in several phases between now and 1998 and will remain valid until the year 2010.

The other parties reject the quota system in favour of other solutions. In 1986, the CDU (Christian Democratic Union) undertook to appoint women to offices and give them mandates at least in proportion to the female membership in the party - an undertaking which was reaffirmed in 1988. By 1992, the FDP (Free Democratic Party) also intends to have brought the proportion of women in decision-making bodies into line with the size of its female membership. About one-quarter of the members of the CDU and the FDP are women.

Re Article 5a: Elimination of stereotyped roles

As a supplement to the Report (see Report No. 76) mention must be made here of efforts to eliminate advertisements which discriminate against women. Advertisements in the mass media can exert an influence both on role perceptions and on perceptions of the nature and duties of women. In the past few years, advertisements which contain flagrant discrimination against women, in which women are depicted as mere sex-objects or decoration, have diminished. Still prevalent is, however, advertisements which are based on traditional and out-moded perceptions of the roles of men and women. More and more women and women's organizations are challenging this type of practice.

The task of the Deutsche Werberat (German Advertising Council), a voluntary supervisory body founded by the advertising industry, is to look into complaints about discriminating advertisements and, where necessary query them. Since 1985, this body has been working in close cooperation with the National Council of German Women, the parent organization of the German Women's Organizations, and with the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health in an effort to stem the proliferation of advertisements which discriminate against women. The question as to whether a specific advertisement discriminates against women because it establishes stereotyped roles, is often a controversial one since there is a paucity of objective criteria on which judgement can be based. However, there is no denying that, over the past few years, sensitivity to this problem has increased. The Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health intends to hold discussions with all those involved - in particular with the advertising industry - with a view to increasing this sensitivity even more.

The problem of stereotyped roles in school-books is discussed below in connection with Article 10.

Re Article 6: Suppression of traffic in women and exploitation of prostitution of women

Since 1989, the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health has been calling for a research project to lay the foundations for political measures to combat the trade in human beings including forced prostitution and sex-tourism.

In the meantime, many counselling centers already exist for affected women. One of these - a large counselling and information center in Stuttgart offering an extensive range of services - was set up within the framework of a pilot project financed by the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health in collaboration with the Land of Baden-Württemberg.

In 1988 the Federal Government replied to two major interpellations from members of the German Bundestag on "Human Rights Violations against Women" and "Traffic in Foreign Girls and Women" and its response went into these problems in detail.

Re Article 7: Elimination of discrimination in political and public life

As mentioned in the Report (see Nos. 87 - 90) women are fully entitled to exercise the rights of participation and co-determination in politics provided for in Article 7 a - c of the Convention. The de facto poor participation of women in public life was discussed in Part I. The efforts undertaken by the political parties to allow women greater access to functions of responsibility, were described above in the comment on Article 4. At present there are no plans to take legal or other government measures to increase the proportion of women in public life.

Re Article 8: Participation of women at the international level

The proportion of women in the Foreign Service has continued to grow. The increased interest shown by young women for the work in this field has led to a situation where the proportion of women receiving training in 1989 amounted to almost 50 %. On the other hand, the proportion of women in positions of authority at higher intermediate level is lower, owing to the fact that there were less applications from women in earlier years. Six out of 200 diplomatic missions abroad are headed by women, four are Permanent Representatives or Director-Generals in the B3/A16 salary bracket and six are Heads of Division in Bonn.

For many years now, the Federal Government has been striving to nominate suitable female candidates for vacant posts in the secretariats of international organizations and to support their applications. Of 111 German citizens employed at what amounts to higher civil service level at the UN Secretariat, 32 or 28.8 % are women.

Re Article 9: Nationality

No addition to the Report (see No. 94).

Re Article 10: Equality in the field of education

1. In the Federal Republic of Germany, compulsory education usually commences for all children upon completion of the 6th birthday. As a rule, it lasts for 12 years.

   The educational opportunities open to girls have shown a clear improvement in the past few years. The proportion of girls attending schools providing general education has remained steady, since 1980, at 48.8 %. A comparison of the different types of schools shows that more girls attend schools which offer higher qualifications than was the case previously (see Table 4.1). There has also been a marked increase in the number of girls visiting schools of higher education (see Table 4.2). However, they concentrated on certain branches of study such as the teaching profession where they accounted for 71.8 % of the students. On the other hand, in other subjects, they are still a minority especially in engineering (11.8 %), mathematics and the natural sciences (31.4 %).

2. A similar situation exists in the case of vocational training where most girls choose from a very small selection of training occupations, principally in the services sector.

All in all there are about 430 officially recognized training occupations. More than half of the girls who decide to do vocational training choose one of ten occupations (54.9 %); approximately one-third of all of the girls concentrate on 5 occupations alone (see Table 4.3). By contrast, boys are distributed more evenly over the entire spectrum of training occupations (Table 4.4).

In 1989, the Federal Ministry for Education and Science initiated a 4-year nation-wide information campaign directed not only at girls and young women, but also at their parents, teachers, friends, colleagues as well as job-counsellors, trainers and employers. It seeks to encourage girls to give greater consideration to those professions which have hitherto been male-dominated when choosing their future profession. Another objective of the campaign is to change the attitudes of all those involved towards the professional role perceptions which have been handed down to us. The same goal lies behind an extensive advertising campaign started by the Federal Ministry for Posts and Telecommunications to increase the proportion of women with technical occupations in the German postal service. The Federal Labour Office is also undertaking major efforts to arouse girls' interest particularly in the industrial and technical professions. Finally, numerous pilot projects are being conducted on this issue both on the federal level and by the Laender (see Report Nos. 98 to 102).

3. The co-education model called for by Article 10 c of the Convention was introduced in the Federal Republic of Germany as early as the 1970s. However, very recent investigations show that joint schooling for boys and girls does not necessarily eliminate or prevent stereotyped role perceptions or schooling deficiencies. On the contrary, in many cases, girls are often at a disadvantage in the co-education model since the teaching methods are tailored more to boys than to girls. This applies in particular to the natural science and technical subjects.

It is not our intention to challenge the co-education model as a matter of principle. Nonetheless, it is necessary that its conception be improved, teaching methods revised and teachers be trained in such a way that they promote and encourage girls as much as they do boys.

4. A considerable number of school-books continue to be characterized by an out-moded perception of the role of women. Even our latest studies on school-books designed for primary schools - such as an investigation carried out in the Saarland, the findings of which were published in 1988 - confirm this.

As early as 1986, the Standing Conference of the Ministers Responsible for Education adopted basic principles for the conception of school-books, according to which, stereotyped roles and one-sided task-allocations should be avoided or challenged. By no means do all of the school-books available today observe these principles; nevertheless, it is important to note that school administrations, publishers of school-books, authors and parents are all much more aware of this issue today than they were a few years ago.

5. A relatively new research direction which developed in close connection with the New Women's Movement - women's research - is making a contribution to the elimination of discrimination against women. Women's research analyses open and disguised discrimination against women and investigates the achievements of women today and in the past. It distinguishes itself from general research through the importance it affords to including what is defined as the "private" spheres of life and its linking of theory and practice. It has, for example, made a major contribution to making violence against women a public topic.

Since the 1970's female scientists have been at pains to institutionalize women's research, and to introduce the issues which it tackles and findings it has produced into all the fields of science and teaching. More and more research facilities have been established in recent years. There are, at present, 18 chairs for women's research at the universities of the Federal Republic of Germany alongside almost 40 other research institutions which focus mainly on this area of activity.

Re Article 11: Equality in working life

Since a detailed stance was taken on Article 11 in the initial Report (see Report Nos. 112 - 159), only a few points will be highlighted here.

a) The labour law provisions referred to in the Report (Report Nos. 112 to 120) have had a positive effect in practice. In March 1989, the Federal Labour Court ruled that where a person applying for a job suffers discrimination because of her sex, the employer is basically under the obligation to also compensate for the immaterial damage suffered by the victim through the violation of her right of privacy. The damages payable are to be fixed as a rule at one month's pay.

The Federal Government intends to promote more equal opportunity in hiring and promotion practices by means of a law which is to further develop the provisions currently in force. The Bill is expected to be introduced into the legislative process at the beginning of 1990.

b) The labour market is still considerably tighter for women than it is for men. As in the case of professional education, in exercising a profession, women tend to concentrate on a relatively narrow spectrum of occupations. In 1987, approximately two-thirds of all women gainfully employed were distributed in 12 occupational groups (see Table 3.3). The majority were employed in organization, administrative and office jobs followed by sales and health-related jobs.

The Federal and Laender Governments are employing pilot projects and investigations to publicize the range of jobs open to women, especially in the industrial and technical occupations. Two examples of such projects initiated by the Federal Government are an investigation on the "Professional Qualification of Women to improve their Professional Chances in the Introduction of New Technology" and a pilot project entitled "EDP Training by Women for Women".

A further example of how the spectrum of jobs for women is being widened is provided by the Federal Armed Forces. Since 1 July 1989, young women have the possibility of entering the medical service of the Federal Armed Forces voluntarily as candidates for the officer's rank. Since 1975 it has only been possible for licensed female doctors, dentists, pharmacists and veterinarians to work as health officers. There are also plans to open up all careers of the medical service to women from autumn 1990. A corresponding amendment to the Army Law is being prepared. This is not in conflict with Art. 12a, paragraph 4, sentence 2 of the Basic Law since the members of the medical service do not render service involving the use of arms.

It can readily be affirmed that women are taking up the offer of new fields of activity. However, on the whole, the range of possibilities offered to them is still too limited.

c) More and more women wish to resume gainful employment after their child-raising period. Some 320,000 women, 70 % of them under the age of 40, return to the job market every year. An estimated 2.3 million women who are not gainfully employed at present are expected to want to return to their professions over the next few years.

Since the end of the 1970s, numerous educational measures have been taken to promote professional reinsertion. Within the framework of the 1987 coalition agreement, the Federal Government assented to the establishment of a special programme aimed at re-inserting women into working life and taking women in the rural areas into account. This special programme is being carried out in collaboration with the Federal Labour Office, firms, and agencies responsible for further training. It is divided into 2 parts:

- Counselling centers (17 in all) are to be built in all of the Laender to furnish women with the information and orientation which they need either to become reinserted into working life or to carry out any other activity outside the home. This phase of the programme commenced in June 1989 and is limited to 3 years.

- In certain professional branches, pilot projects concerned with the training of women after the child-raising phase are being developed and tested. The aim of this endeavour is to prepare women for the new demands of working life and to create the necessary preconditions for an increase in the offer of qualified permanent jobs for women returning to the world of work. This part of the special programme will be implemented in 1990.

d) The Federal Government is currently preparing a report on the situation of women in the civil service and the effects of the "Guideline for the Professional Advancement of Women in the Federal Administration" issued in February 1986 (see Report No. 123). It will take careful stock of the situation and will serve as a basis for the further development of the Guideline to which end the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health is presently preparing a draft.

Some of the Federal Laender have already submitted reports on their experiences in the implementation of their advancement-related guidelines and on the situation of women in the civil service of the Land.

In the supreme federal authorities the trend described in the Report (see Report No. 125) persists. In 1987, just as many women as men were employed. The proportion of women employed was almost as high as the proportion of applications made by them.

e) The average gross income of women lags behind that of men. Although it has been possible to steadily reduce the gap, the pay-gap in the groups of the salaried employees has ceased to diminish during the past ten years (Table 3.4).

To a great extent, today's differences in income between men and women can be traced back to structural factors. Women are mainly employed at the lowest levels of the economic ladder, have a shorter working-week, do less overtime and less (better-paid) shift work. Most often, they have less years of service and only rarely do they reach the age-levels which are paid the highest tariffs.

In addition to these structural factors, wage discrimination based on the fact that women's work was considered devoid of all value, persisted until very recently. In the past, only work which was linked with considerable muscle power was considered heavy labour whereas the work normally done by women was considered light work and as such was paid at a lower rate.

In recent years, this has changed radically. During the last collective bargaining sessions, the so-called "light work" wage-group was deleted in many collective agreements and the lower wage-groups raised. In April 1988, the Federal Labour Court ruled - with reference to the European Court of Justice - that in assessing heavy labour not only the degree of muscle power needed should be taken into account, but also all conditions which cause a strain on the human being and could cause physical reactions. This ruling will lead to a revision of the decisive job-characteristics which serve as a basis for the establishment of salary groups. This will lead to the elimination of wage-discrimination insofar as it still exists.

Special investigations on sex-specific differences in health behaviour and pilot tests in the area of psychosocial and medical provision complement these activities.

c) The past few years have witnessed a sharp decline in maternal and infant mortality. The number of mothers dying per 100,000 births dropped from 51.8 in 1970 to 20.0 in 1981 and to 8.7 in 1987 - six times less than the 1970 figure. Out of 1,000 live births in 1987, 8.3 infants still died. This development can be principally traced back to the free medical check-ups for pregnant women, new-born babies, infants and small children which were introduced by the statutory health insurances in 1966. In addition to this service, the health offices of the public health system offer free counselling in all health-related matters for pregnant women and mothers. Progress in the provision of assistance at birth and comprehensive information about family planning, pregnancy and birth contributed to this positive development.

d) In recent years, major medical and technical progress has been made in the attempt to treat undesired childlessness. The result is a number of treatment techniques, almost all of which envisage interventions in the woman's body. In 1978, the first in-vitro fertilization was performed and the method has spread all over the world since then. However, these new possibilities also engendered new risks which do not only affect the handi-work of the physicians but raise both ethical and legal questions. The abuse of medical and technical innovations in the fields of procreative medicine, genetic diagnostics and genetic therapy is to be prevented by legislative means. The Act Amending the Act on the Placement of Children for Adoption which entered into force in November 1989 provides for the prohibition of the brokerage and bringing about of any form of substitute motherhood. Other issues such as:

- the intentional determination of the sex of the child
- research on embryos
- the manipulation of the genetic make-up of human beings are to be regulated in the Act on the Protection of Embryos which is now being discussed in Parliament.

e) From the statistical point of view, women are less severely hit by AIDS than men. In July 1989, only 257 of the 3,636 registered AIDS patients were women. However, when infected themselves or as partners or mothers of infected persons, women are often affected by the disease in a different way. The Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health has created diverse types of assistance in the form of counselling, care and other services tailored to meet the needs of women, within the framework of various pilot programmes. Some examples of the latter are: "Psycho-social counselling measures in connection with AIDS", "Care and counselling of drug-addicts infected with HIV", "AIDS and Children", "AIDS and Women". Furthermore, the AIDS-related awareness-building efforts among women are being intensified.

f) The discussion on the conditions under which an abortion may be performed with impunity has been characterized by controversy since the early 1970s. Even after the amendment of § 218 in 1976, the German Penal Code provides that an abortion is, in principle, punishable unless:

- the woman's life or health is considerably endangered, the "medical indication",
- such serious physical or mental damage to the child is to be feared that the woman cannot be reasonably expected to carry the pregnancy to term (up to 22 weeks after conception), the "eugenic indication",

- the pregnancy is the result of a sexual crime (up to 12 weeks after conception), the "criminological indication",
- the danger exists that the woman's social situation will degenerate to an extent which she cannot reasonably be expected to tolerate (up to 12 weeks after conception) "social indication".

In 1988, a total of 83,784 abortions were registered: 86.8 % were performed on grave social grounds and 8.9 % on medical grounds. It is taken for granted that there is a much larger number of abortions which do not figure in the statistics ("reporting deficit"). Serious calculations set the yearly abortion rate at 250,000. This high figure has led the State to make increased efforts to provide better protection for unborn life. These measures must be continued and extended.

The Federal Government is endeavouring to broaden and improve the services offered in the area of counselling and support for pregnant women and young mothers especially those women who find themselves in a grave social predicament or conflictful situation as a result of pregnancy. In 1984, the Government set up the "Mother and Child - Protection of Unborn Life" Foundation which is meant to provide assistance to women with conflictful pregnancies and help them to carry the pregnancy to term. In 1989, the Foundation received DM 130 million from the Federal budget. To date, 200,000 women have received assistance consistent with their individual needs.

Re Article 14: Equality in rural areas

In addition to the information presented in the Report (Nos. 161 - 171), it should be noted that several research projects are currently being conducted by the Federal Government on the situation of women in rural areas with a view to obtaining detailed data on the women's policy measures which are necessary. With the support of the Federal Ministry for Food, Agriculture and Forestry, the German Rural Women's Association conducted a study on the "living and working situation of female farmers and farmer's wives". This study is expected to bring new insights into the special situation prevailing on farms, including non-agricultural activities, the schooling and occupational training of rural women, their family situation, social security and their involvement in public life. This study is being supplemented by an investigation commissioned by the Federal Ministry for Youth, Family Affairs, Women and Health on women who live in rural areas but do not work in agriculture itself. Within the framework of another of the Federal Government's pilot programmes entitled "Re-insertion of women into working life after the child-raising period" (see above, comment on Article 11) special attention is being accorded to women in rural areas.

Annex II - Overview of measures taken to achieve equal rights

1. Acts aiming at the attainment of equal rights

1949 — The Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany

Art. 3 (2): Men and women shall have equal rights.

Art. 117 (1): Laws which are inconsistent with Art. 3 (2) shall be adapted accordingly.

1952 — Act on the Protection of gainfully employed Mothers (Maternity Protection Act)

1957 — Regulation on Maternity Protection for Female Civil Servants

1958 — Act on the Equality between Men and Women under Civil Law

- The right of the husband to take the final decision in all matrimonial affairs is deleted without substitution. Where, however, parents fail to come to an agreement in matters concerning a child, the father retains the casting vote.

- The right of the husband to terminate his wife's employment without notice is repealed. Nevertheless, a wife may still only be gainfully employed where this activity can be reconciled with her household and family chores.

- The property increment system becomes the statutory system of marital property.

Thus, in the event of divorce, non-working wives are also entitled to claim half of the property accrued during marriage.

- In 1953, the Federal Constitutional Court had ruled that it was in contravention of Article 3 of the Basic Law for fathers to have the casting vote and thus repealed this right.

1961 Act to amend Family Law

- Improvement in the legal status of a wife if her husband applied for a divorce because the marriage has failed.

- Improvement in the legal status of unmarried mothers: upon application, a mother of full age may obtain parental authority over the child from the Guardianship Court.

- Fathers are legally required to pay maintenance for a child up to the completion of 18 years of age (previously up to 16 years of age).

1962 The Federal Social Assistance Act

Creates a legal claim in special circumstances to

- preventive health care
- assistance for expectant mothers
- assistance in obtaining care
- assistance in connection with the continued maintenance of the household
- assistance to persons at risk.

1964 Introduction of compensation for damage suffered by widows within the framework of provisions for war victims.

Special provisions for seriously injured housewives within the framework of industrial damage compensation; special provision for injured housewives for purposes of income equalization.

1968 Law to amend the Maternity Protection Act

The protective period prior to childbirth is fixed at six weeks and the period after childbirth is raised from six to eight weeks.

1970 Act on the legal Status of illegitimate Children

- Mothers exercise full parental authority from the birth of a child onwards.
- The child's claim to maintenance from his father is improved.
- The claim to maintenance no longer ends at the age of 18 but on completion of an appropriate vocational training.
- For inheritance purposes, the child enjoys the same legal status as a legitimate child.
- The child receives the surname which the mother carries at the time of birth.

1970 Act to amend the Reich and Nationality Act

Under this law, both the husbands and wives of German nationals can apply for German nationality on an equal basis.

1972 Pension Reform Law

- Women who are not gainfully employed are given an opportunity to enter the pension insurance scheme.

- Introduction of a flexible pensionable age.

- Computation of pension in accordance with minimum income.

- Facilitation of the preconditions for the granting of pensions to the widows of divorced persons.

1974 Law to improve Benefits under the statutory Sickness Insurance Scheme

- Gainfully employed parents subject to obligatory social insurance become entitled to 5 working days leave per child every year to look after a sick child under 8 years of age; in the case of loss of earnings, they are entitled to a sickness benefit;

- they are also entitled to a domestic help for the duration of their stay in hospital or at a health resort if a child under 8 years of age or a handicapped child in the family cannot be looked after elsewhere.

1974 Fifth Act to amend the Penal Code

This Act provides impunity for abortions effected during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy.

In 1975, this Amending Act was rescinded by the Federal Constitutional Court.

1976 Fifteenth Act to amend the Penal Code

Under this Act, an abortion is in principle punishable. It is not punishable only where the pregnant woman gives her consent and grounds for one of the following exist:

- medical indication
- eugenic indication
- criminological indication
- social indication.

1977 Act to reform the Marriage and Family Law

- The German Civil Code discarded the guiding principle of housewife-marriage and refrained from constructing models for married life.

- On marriage, the couple may adopt the wife's maiden name as the family name if they so wish.

- As regards the Law of divorce, the principle of guilt was substituted by the principle of broken marriage.

- Nor do the consequences of a divorce, e.g. maintenance and custody of the children depend on the guilt principle.

- Statutory equalization of pensions upon dissolution of marriage which aims to provide social security for non-employed wives and mothers.

1979 Maternity Leave Act

Working mothers become entitled to four months maternity leave in addition to the previous protective period and to a payment in lieu of wages. Furthermore, they are now protected against dismissal at work.

1980 Revision of the Law on Parental Care

A new legal basis is created to regulate the relationship between parents and children. It grants children sufficient protection while at the same time respecting the family's responsibility for itself and the parental rights safeguarded by the Constitution.

- Requirement to advertise vacancies for work on a non-gender basis.

- Onus of proof rests with the employer if a female employee adduces credible facts suggesting discrimination because of her gender.

1984 Waiting Periods for Old-Age Pensions

Waiting periods are reduced from 15 to 5 years.
